

Sadhus, Going beyond the dreadlocks

Sadhus are Indian wandering renunciants wearing long dreadlocks and orange colored rags. They are so often photographed, yet their words are seldom heard. Very little is known about them. They have given up their name, family, house, job and caste, to become wandering renunciants, begging monks, mystical walkers, roaming philosophers, miracle-workers, hashish smokers, holymen. People interested in Eastern philosophy and spirituality, those practicing meditation and yoga, those who have been traveling in India and some who have watched documentary films are eager to get better acquainted with them. In a world verging on its short term ecological doom and demographic tsunami, the sadhus are the messengers of a kind of freedom and moderation that our commercial civilization has forgotten with its preaching of labour, consumption, economic growth and competition. Patrick Levy recounts their everyday lives, the respect they are given and how they use of it, their teachings, their philosophy and the way they transform it into a lifestyle. Sadhus going beyond the dreadlocks is a novel, written in the form of a road movie. It is a spiritual journey into the world of sadhus. Honest, quirky and thought provoking. Spice Magazine
